Regular languages continue to be of importance in the study of circuit complexity. Recently, we have been able to prove non-linear lower bounds on the number of wires required to recognize certain languages with constant-depth boolean circuits. Interesting questions remain open.